Understanding Attachment Styles

The concept of attachment styles originates from attachment theory, which was first developed by psychologist John Bowlby. Attachment styles describe the characteristic ways individuals relate to others in close relationships, shaped largely by early interactions with caregivers. There are four primary attachment styles: secure, anxious-preoccupied, dismissive-avoidant, and fearful-avoidant (often referred to as disorganized). Each style reflects different patterns of emotional bonding, trust, and dependence.

The Four Main Attachment Styles

Each attachment style has distinct features that influence how people behave in relationships:

- Secure Attachment: Individuals with this style tend to feel comfortable with intimacy and are generally trusting and emotionally balanced.

- Anxious Attachment: Those with anxious attachment often seek approval and reassurance, feeling insecure about relationships.
- Avoidant Attachment: Avoidant individuals typically maintain emotional distance and may suppress feelings to avoid dependency.
- Disorganized Attachment: This style combines anxious and avoidant behaviors, often resulting from traumatic or inconsistent caregiving.

Sample Book Insights: #1 The first few chapters of this book will help you understand what attachment theory is and how it impacts your day-to-day interactions with others. printable attachment style quiz: Development of the Adult Attachment Style Questionnaire Joanne M. Harste, 2000 The purpose of this study was to first propose dimensions of adult attachment and then to design a measure of adult attachment able to successfully assess these dimensions.--Page 4.

printable attachment style quiz: An Exploration of Attraction Through Attachment Theory Lydia Luna, 2013 The purpose of this quantitative study was to test the theory of attachment that assesses an attachment style's effect on the selection of a romantic partner. The researcher tested 4 hypotheses based on similar or differing attachment styles in the selection of a romantic partner. The sample consisted of 61 heterosexual couples between the ages of 18 and 64 who were currently involved in an exclusive romantic relationship of 6 months or more. The following hypotheses were tested: (1) Secure individuals will select romantic partners who have similar attachment styles. (2) Anxious-ambivalent (preoccupied) individuals will select romantic partners who have secure attachment styles or fearful-avoidant attachment styles. (3) Fearful-avoidant individuals will select romantic partners who have secure attachment styles or anxious-ambivalent (preoccupied) attachment styles. (4) Dismissive-avoidant individuals will select romantic partners who have avoidant (fearful or dismissive) attachment styles. The attachment style dimensions were measured using Fraley, Waller, and Brennan's (2000) Experience in Close Relationship-Revised (ECR-R) to evaluate the dimensions of anxiety and avoidance directly. Additionally, Griffin and Bartholomew's (1994a) Relationship Scales Questionnaire (RSQ) measured the 4 adult attachment patterns: secure, preoccupied, fearful, and dismissing. The present study utilized a correlational analysis to test the hypotheses based on attachment style dimensions, and an intercorrelational matrix to test the 4 main hypotheses based on the 4 categories of attachment. The findings suggest, in terms of attachment styles, that securely attached individuals are more likely to select a romantic partner with the same attachment style. Additionally, in terms of attachment style dimensions, females who are anxious are more likely to select a male who has an avoidant attachment style dimension. An interesting finding, not hypothesized, was that individuals with a dismissive-avoidant attachment style are more likely to select a romantic partner who is securely attached. There was no evidence to support that anxious-ambivalent or fearful-avoidant individuals selected securely attached individuals or that dismissive-avoidant individuals selected avoidantly (fearful or dismissive) attached individuals. Studies on romantic attachment have vital implications for practice, and consequently for enhancing relationship stability. This study can contribute to clinicians' growing understanding of attachment theory and adult romantic attraction.

printable attachment style quiz: Romantic Attachment Styles, Gender, and Reasons for Living, 2003 The purpose of this study was to examine reasons for living in people with secure, avoidant, and anxious/ambivalent romantic attachment styles. Romantic attachment style was assessed by use of the Adult Attachment Questionnaire (AAQ). Reasons for living were assessed using the Reasons for Living Inventory (RFL). The independent variables were gender and romantic attachment style. The dependent variable was the RFL score. Participants included 235 male and female students from a southeastern university. A brief demographic questionnaire, the RFL (Linehan, et al., 1983), and the AAQ (Hazan & Shaver, 1987), were administered in electronic format on-line. A 3 (attachment style) X 2 (gender) Analysis of Variance with unequal cell sizes was used to test for main and interaction effects. The significance level was set at .05. Implications of findings and suggestions for future research were discussed.

printable attachment style quiz: The Effects of Attachment Style on Relationship Satisfaction Kelsey Larson, 2013 The present study investigated the three different attachment styles of secure, anxious-ambivalent, and avoidant and the propensity each style had toward an increase or decrease in relationship satisfaction. A sample of 271 participants between the ages of 18 and 64 completed the Adult Attachment Questionnaire (AAQ) and the Relationship Scales Questionnaire (RSQ) to examine attachment style, and the Relationship Assessment Scale (RAS) to determine relationship satisfaction. Results indicated that securely attached individuals were more inclined to experience higher relationship satisfaction and insecurely attached individuals were more inclined to experience lower relationship satisfaction.

printable attachment style quiz: Does Attachment Style Influence Intimacy Following High- and Low- Risk Interactions Jana Ilene Joseph, 2005 This study examined the relation between attachment characteristics and intimacy experienced after one's attachment style is activated. Attachment theory states that when an individual feels threatened by an attachment figure, attachment style is activated and dictates how that individual relates to his or her partner in that situation. This study tests this theory. Data were collected on 110 committed romantic couples from the community. Each individual completed a series of questionnaires, including the Adult Attachment Questionnaire. Couples then engaged in a series of four videotaped interactions in which both partners had an opportunity to discuss times in which their feelings were hurt by someone other than their partner and times in which their feelings were hurt by their partner. These interactions were regarded as low- and high-risk, respectively. The high-risk interaction was specifically targeted to activate attachment style and elicit attachment behaviors. Analyses were conducted using the Actor-Partner Interdependence Model (APIM). This model takes into account the interdependence of observations between partners. As a function of this model, both actor effects (the effect one's own attachment style has on one's own experiences of intimacy) and partner effects (the effect one's own attachment style has on one's partner's experiences of intimacy) were examined. Intimacy was conceptualized in two different manners: state (post-interaction intimacy) and trait (overall intimacy in the relationship). It was hypothesized that individuals with insecure attachment characteristics would report lower feelings of both state and trait intimacy compared to securely attached individuals. It was also predicted that the partners of individuals with insecure attachment characteristics would report lower state and trait intimacy following the high-risk interaction compared to partners of secure individuals. The results of this study supported these hypotheses. Models testing the effect of the attachment characteristics avoidance, ambivalence, and avoidance-x-ambivalence found a relation between the presence of insecure attachment characteristics and lower levels of both state and trait intimacy. Implications of these results and future directions of study are discussed.
